In the wake of the Rhonda Rousey beat down, the UFC (Underwhelming Fighters Club) is now looking for their next big star. They are reportedly turning to a new (but not foreign!) market, one that is found within the borders of the great US of A. The UFC has found a niche market of untapped potential contenders from videos taken of Black Friday shopping events. The videos themselves can be found on the video streaming site Boo tube, and feature great wannabe fighters around the country. An insider has said that the UFC hired private investigators to find the individuals in the videos to get them into training. Allegedly, the UFC is trying this tactic because of new champion Holly Holms. Without Holly’s quick hands, Rousey would have kept her title. Yet, miss fortune had other plans for Rousey, and so now the UFC is left to find new pay-per-view money markers found within the quick hands of those Black Friday shoppers.

Apparently the UFC is not the only organization using this method, the US Government has begun its own combing of Black Friday shoppers. Their mission is to find the one true super soldier. When reached for comment, U.S General Elmer Fud couldn’t comment on current government proceedings. However, the Department of Recruiting Individuals (DoRI) released a statement that any woman, man or child willing to fight over a television because of a 50% mark down had a place with them and in their countries’ army. Apparently the ruthlessness of the terrorist threat can only be matched by those willing to shake down others in the name of a damn good deal. If you’re interested, the UFC and DoRI are not looking for the best nor the boldest, but merely those with quick hands and a ruthless gumption for a good deal.
