

Rodney the Raven flies south for the winter

Written by N.D. Tyson

In a move that surprised sports mascot fans and ornithologists alike, Rodney the Raven is moving south for the winter. Despite not being a migratory bird or even a bird really, Rodney has decided to take his talents elsewhere for the winter months, citing “creative differences” with many of our school’s winter sports teams.

He recalls a particular incident where he had to endure the putrid stench of hockey equipment wafting in the winter breeze and disturbing his anthropomorphic factories and thinking to himself “CAW, CAAWW, CAAAWWWW”, which roughly translates to “I’ve had enough of this, I’m getting out of here”.

Rumour has it that he is in competition to replace the Baltimore Raven’s mascot, Poe. Recently, Poe has been linked to several Baltimore criminal organizations, such as the house of Usher and the Barksdale organization, forcing Baltimore to reconsider its affiliation with such a shady organization. Because the Baltimore Ravens are known for their zero tolerance policy for team members who acts in an immoral fashion.

“CAAAWWWW CAAAWWWW!”
