

A radical demonstration will be taking place in the Atrium this Thursday and Friday in support of the Groundhog's of Carleton campus. Due to the lack of funds for clubs and societies, The Hallowed Hog will not be able to feed the groundhog collective that resides on campus this year, and a winter of famine is currently projected by arts students and fear mongers alike.

Last year, the Clubs and Societies levy was quashed by anti-groundhog forces hoping to reduce the number of awesome animals on campus. The levy was dedicated to clubs that feed and provide for “all hairy mammals on campus that cannot support themselves”. As we all know, this will affect engineering students heavily, and their lack of humour is already beginning to show.

Soon after his election, Justin Shrewdeau made his point, saying “Stand down the F-35’s, and I think everyone should think about going to that demonstration on groundhog affairs at Carleton University. It seems pretty important”.

Witnessed by public affairs and policy management undergraduate Patrick Starburns, he recalls the harrowing events. “It was terrible, seeing the little family of critters. They had collected some change in their shaking paws and wanted a grilled cheese with havarti and caramelized onions. Worst of all, they cut me in line, so security had to take them away”.

We ask that you attend this informative workshop, and we hope that, with your help, this crisis can be avoided.
