

Trump Fires Back after Iowa Defeat

By Gael Masonga on February 25, 2016

“Cruz is gonna lose!”

After losing the Iowa caucus primary to Ted Cruz, Trump has decided to fire back at his opponent in the medium best fitting of an ideological battle: a diss track. Boasting such fiery rhetoric as “You’re going to lose Cruz, you lack a blue’s clues on how to do news. No one likes you (sic), you’re fired.” After his daughter Ivanka reminded him that the majority of his supporting demographic are xenophobic old men who consider rap to be “Satan’s Music”, Trump removed the song from his campaign website and instead took to Twitter to sling allegations at Cruz. In his tirades, Trump claimed that the Texas senator violated voting procedures by tricking Iowa voters to vote for him. In an ironic twist of fate, the words spewed forth by the bastard child of Jabba the Hutt and a discoloured orange Fruit Roll-Up may contain some truth. Messages have surfaced that reveal Cruz misleading Iowa voters to believe that America’s weird Uncle Ben Carson was dropping out of the race. Some have speculated that these manoeuvres were targeting religious voters in the Carson camp who would default to Cruz should Carson not follow through with his electoral campaign. This reporter, for one, is shocked and appalled to see such underhanded tactics used in electoral politics. Politics, historically, have always been a fair and unbiased assessment of a person’s ability to lead in a bipartisan environment where cooperation and transparency have always been at the forefront of the political process.