

Man given nobel prize after discovering what GeeGee is

Written by Joshua Cohen-Collier on September 14, 2015

Mohammed Farhat to be honored at February prize ceremony.

In a monumental discovery for all of mankind, a Toronto man has determined what the mascot of the University of Ottawa sports teams actually is.

The discovery is sure to shake up the landscape of the study of biology, as it has now been determined that the now-extinct breed of horse was once used exclusively for racing. Ecuus GeeGee went extinct during the Paleolithic era. After realizing that the name GeeGee is ridiculous, and that no one actually knew what it was, the species committed mass suicide, leading to its eradication.

Farhat made the discovery while researching at the California Institute of Ridiculous Animal Studies. In a statement, Farhat thanked god for his discovery, and stated his belief that all horse names are ridiculous.

uOttawa

The University of Ottawa uses perhaps the most ridiculous mascot in Canadian history