In an effort to seize the electoral spotlight, where e're a light has been shone before, the Liberal party has ramped up the social media war against their candidate rivals in what critics have reviewed as "a groin-shattering exposé". Following the rally at Regent Park where Prime Minister-candidate, Justin Trudeau, shared a scandalous quick peck with Ontario Premier, Kathleen Wynne, the Liberal party announced their new campaign tactic, A Study Inside Scarlet. The "tasteful" adult film was apparently designed to reach out to voters in a more human fashion and also to demonstrate the newly imposed curriculum of sex education across Ontario.

Says Wynne, "When Anna Gainey (Liberal Party President) approached me with the idea, I was ecstatic. Although, it was misinterpreted that she herself would take part. However, when I saw the potential for really connecting with voters (and Prime Minister hopefuls!) I decided to take a closer look. Besides, how could one resist Trudeau's soft complexion and effeminate charm? The script wasn't half bad either." According to varying sources, the notion was concocted months beforehand in an half-assed attempt to teach whole-assed lessons on sexual intercourse, as-it-were, in-person.

It was no surprise that the right candidate for the job in hand would be the bouncing beautiful boy who might draw Canadians out from their bedrooms and into the voter-booths.

However, before Trudeau was able to take part, it was discovered that (to Harper's glee) he was not quite ready. "Justin was very excited to begin filming, but he was given away right before shooting when he didn't catch on to the whole 'put the ballot in the box' scene", from Jeremy Broadhurst, who was forced to call in Jean Chrétien to give Trudeau 'the talk'. "Who else could I call? Paul Martin?"

After a few hours of Justin sitting on Jeans knee, nodding away as he began to understand "da beeurds an de beez", the star was ready for production, Wynne had her 'fluffing' and history was made. The trailer for A Study Inside Scarlet has been released on the Liberal party website, and the full-length edition is available for purchase with a commemorative lawn sign and dildo. The RCMP have responded with a country-wide ban on NDP candidate Thomas Mulclair from retaliating on grounds of "domestic terrorism" as it would be comparable to "watching your parents have sex with your gym coach".
