

Local group Seeks to End Solicitation On Campus (Not the Good Kind)
By: Alexander Wherret on Oct. 12, 2015

GETLOST

A local group of students upset at the constant harassment when walking through Carleton's University Center has set up an awareness booth to protest the relentless solicitation by other organizations in the area. GET LOST is made up of personnel who have all been affected by social harassment in some way or another.

"If it's not some fraternity or sorority pestering you about events and participation then it's some vague charity pleading with you to fork over any change that you have," and "The only change I've got as a student is when I change my socks each week".

The student in question is a self-proclaimed introvert (wishing to remain anonymous), and is taking a confidential stand for all other introvertigoed persons who feel slightly bothered by the guaranteed human interaction they all fear.

Efforts by GET LOST have thus far involved setting up a booth in the back corner of the Atrium where no one will notice them much, but all are free to pick up a pamphlet on harassment issues if they so choose, no pressure. "Sorry."

The group can possibly be found once a week in the Atrium if they get around to it maybe. Should the group be set up, it's really your choice (if you should feel so inclined) as to ask them any questions. Though inquiring students should be slow, so as not to startle the members.

"We don't really want to bother anyone, but this issue of people being frequently approached really has to stop," said group member Ronald Blump, before making a gesture to his fellow supporters to intervene on the interview.