

Man Fares Much Better in Hypothetical Fights after Consecutive Visits to Gym

Written by Dave Fingland

“But boys! I’ve been lifting!” Concerned with lack of faith in perceived scrapping ability, a local student has taken matters into his own fists. Larry Gibson, local Ottawa U student, became concerned after his friends assured him that he could not, “take that bouncer”. How could a man come back from such poor showing in the social arena?

After a few minutes of soul searching, Gibson resolved to hit the weights, though not too hard in case they hit back. Two days passed without so much as a hint of a bulging bicep. This would not do. A quick learner, as many Ottawa U students are, Larry was able to identify a more direct avenue to success.

With a simple, “but boys, I have been lifting!” interjection into the next discussion of physical prowess, Gibson was able to repair his reputation.

He can be spotted out on the streets of downtown, with a protein shake and a gym bag, pointing out to confused tourists which men he can most definitely get in a tilly with.
