

Carleton Selling Smokes on Campus Again

By: Jonathan Marshall on October 6, 2015

After a long awaited arrival, and fears that it would never resume, Carleton administration has bowed to student pressure and is now selling Smokes Poutine on campus again.

Many students feel unburdened with the new venue on campus, located in the University Centre's Food Court. Though, with the boon in sales comes a not unexpected health controversy.

Miami Bloom, a graduate student and president of 'Leave the Gravy'n'Cheese Behind', finds the admittance of these "obesity sticks" a sign of decline in the universities health care agenda, and that it perpetuates an unhealthy lifestyle.

"I believe it's up to the administration to protect us from making these sort of decisions, I mean, who wants to be face-deep in a bacon-cheeseburger poutine at any time they wish between 10:30 - 8 every Monday to Friday?"

Rona Ambrose, Minister for Health was the one who introduced the bill to repeal the ban of Smokes on university campuses. Her former policy of total eradication was to stop the easy access of potato, modified meat broth and curdled dairy products from reaching Canadian youth and to denormalize the consumption of food deemed "naughty" to the government.

However, in a special access interview with The Hallowed Hog, she admitted that 'it all changed' when she stepped inside a pouterie last winter. "It was glorious, did you know you could put, like any animal on there? And the cheesy goodness....how could I have been so wrong?"

She has issued a tearful public apology to those who were without their favourite Canadian dish for so long from the safety of their tertiary institute.

Many students and faculty members are welcoming back their beloved calorie-laden meal, and in no short time before winter. Mr. Agag, department head of Chemical and Environmental Toxicology and known poutine enthusiast calls it a 'great leap forward in freedom of expression'.

“This is just the beginning; first they took our deep-fried doughnuts, next our extra-strength energy drinks, then our deep-fried balls of fat, but now, we take back our poutine. Smokers of the world, unite!”

In all the excitement, Mr. Agag suffered near-fatal cardiac arrest but is recovering in the Ottawa hospital; Ronald McDonald House.
