

Local Man, 37, Content Eating Pizza Dinner in Unicentre Cafeteria

Written by The Guilty Undertaker on December 2nd, 2015

Following a hectic afternoon schedule of appointments and consultations, local Ottawa man Clark Gagnon, 37, told sources on Monday night that he was “super fucking down” concluding his day alone in the Unicentre Cafeteria with two lukewarm slices of pizza and an individual portion of garlic dip.

Gagnon, who works in the Carling area just west of the campus, found himself strolling into his old stomping ground Monday night after the Harvey’s restaurant location he originally planned on dining at was closed.

“Ah yes, the ol’ unicentre. Back during my B.A., this caf was tiny, and you could get a cup of joe for less than a dollar” said Gagnon. “I really wish I had graduated”, he added vacantly.

“You know, at first I felt kind of down because the days are getting colder and darker and I seem to be prolonging any kind of tangible self realization well into my middle age, but then I saw that they had some slices of Canadian remaining, which is great, because I’m Canadian.”

By 7:40pm Eastern Standard Time, much of the student population had already vacated the dining area, allowing Gagnon the rare opportunity to pass from the checkout counter to the table almost instantaneously. Sources also confirmed that Gagnon saved up to thirty seconds because he made his payment with up-to-date VISA Tap™ technology.

“I mean, how does it even work? It doesn’t touch the machine, and takes way less time than chip insertion. Unbelievable.” Dalesworth then proceeded to show off the flashy new card, which doesn’t expire until 2019, by which point he will be 41.

At press time, when pressed for comment about his marriage, Gagnon told reporters, “..yeah, you know, I guess I miss my wife and kids, and I suppose I could have fought a harder custody battle...but, my god, have you tried that garlic dip? Continental joie de vivre!”