

Trump Announces Foxy Running Mate

By Lemmy C. Yatitz on September 22, 2015

In a perhaps not quite so stunning move Thursday, Donald Trump announced at campaign headquarters, Trump Tower, that when he is chosen as the Republican nominee for President, he will select the animal atop his head as his running mate. Until now, the 69-year old billionaire real estate mogul has neglected to delve into what he calls “my naturally grown and coloured hair”.

Yesterday, however, attendees at Trump’s latest speech witnessed him wearing a bright red turban. Initially there were murmurs of racism as the presidential candidate prattled on about Making America Great Again™ until, after half an hour, he switched topics mid-speech to make an important announcement:

“Ladies and gentlemen,” proclaimed the Oompa-Loompa/human hybrid [CONFIRMATION PENDING], “I would like to take this opportunity to present my vice-presidential running mate when I am acclaimed as the presidential nominee at the Republican National Convention in Cleveland next July.”

At that precise moment, Trump unfurled his turban and demonstrated to his faithful supporters that instead of hair growing on his head, he has been employing a fox over the last eight years to hide his receding hairline.

“Money can’t buy me votes...actually yes it can, and it sure as hell can buy a beautiful comment on where or how he acquired the fox. The fox wasn't saying anything either.

Reaction has been mixed towards Mr. Trump’s latest announcement, most notably from his Republican opponents - all fifteen of them. Senator Rand Paul criticized the move, arguing that the billionaire has misled Americans all this time by allowing them to believe that his hair was real.

On the Democrat side, Bernie Sanders (no stranger to receding hairlines himself) announced that if elected he would form a White House position advising the President on hair replacement programs. He declined to comment on the specifics of this position.
