

FBI Wants to take its Relationships with Tech Companies to the Next Level

“A tempting tale of telecommunication tampering”

Having enjoyed a cozy relationship with technology companies in the past, the FBI is looking to spice things up. For all this time the FBI has been a gentleman; getting informed consent before entering a tech companies' backdoor and securely extracting only the most vital of information. The FBI feels that its relationship has become too formulaic and that the removal of such draconian measures would add spontaneity to its relationship with tech companies, something FBI Director James B. Comey says is “a long time coming.”

“We already have unrestricted front door access, it's only a matter of time till we get the back,” explained Comey. Apple, the prom queen of Silicon Valley, is fighting this stance as it believe that it its relationship with the FBI is fine as is and doesn't need to go any farther. Microsoft, the frumpy friend who couldn't find a date for the big dance, is all aboard this movement as it places itself one notch closer to the popular kids' table by sacrificing only a measly shred of customer confidence to thrust itself onto the lap of big government agency.

The FBI did not comment on Microsoft's advances instead deflecting them to the NSA, who took one for the team and combed through Microsoft's expansive data masses like a true bro leaving the FBI to free to continue its pursuit of the prom queen.
