

Local Musician Combating Homophobia with a Weave

Written by Adrienne Row - Smith on November 15, 2015

“Come together, right now, over Weaves”

Ottawa, Ontario - A local musician is trying to combat homophobia in the metal scene by getting a weave. The gentleman in question, a mister Johnathan Davis, lead singer of the band Kornicopia, believes that the best way to reduce “gay bashing” at concerts is to embrace fake hair sew into his own. Davis realized the power of the weave when he noticed an individual clearly sporting a weave in the mosh pit being relentlessly beaten down by others. When he questioned the motives of the bashers, he stated that they were beating on him was because the guy was “hard-core dancing, and that that is something only gay people do”. Taking umbrage to this act, Davis interpreted this to mean that the metal scene is in crisis of homophobia. Davis stated that he pursued other options, such as interrupting sets with kumbaya sessions, only to be met with aggravation and tomatoes.

The only other clear option to him, was to get a weave. Internet research monolith, Wikweavepedia, has shown that men who don weaves are more likely to inspire less homophobia. When reached for comment about the power of a good weave Davis had this to say “When I see a weave, I do not think the person is gay, rather I think that they are a strong independent person who don’t need no homophobia”. Davis noted that he has yet to see a reduction of violence in mosh pits. However, undeterred Davis is continuing to sport his new hairdo, and hoping the world will change, one weave at a time.